First issue of the Journal of Financial Literacy and Wellbeing is now available online

The Global Financial Literacy Excellence Center (GFLEC) is delighted to announce the first issue of the Journal of Financial Literacy and Wellbeing. The journal—the first in the field—spotlights rigorous research that can inform academics, policy makers, and the private sector.

"We are excited about this new academic journal dedicated to a timely, important, and impactful topic. We envision it as the go-to place for the best and most influential research on financial literacy, personal finance, and financial wellbeing. The journal will showcase both theoretical research and empirical work that will advance our understanding of financial literacy and financial decision-making and their impact on society. Have a look at the first issue," said GFLEC Founder and Academic Director Annamaria Lusardi.

Professor Lusardi and Flore-Anne Messy, from the OECD, are co-editors of this new journal.

The inaugural issue includes articles examining the link between financial literacy and financial wellbeing; how financial education can improve citizenship; whether school-based financial education has a spillover effect on parents; and the usefulness of workplace financial education programs. Additional articles look at the effect of financial literacy on the use of financial services and on investments, including mortgages, crypto assets, and stocks.

We are grateful to all those who made the journal possible, including the National Endowment for Financial Education (NEFE), Tim Ranzetta and Next Gen Personal Finance, Sim Kee Boon Institute for Financial Economics at SMU (SKBI), the Retirement and Savings Institute at HEC Montréal, and the publisher, Cambridge University Press.
